Can she save her ranch from her good for nothing, gambling husband?

Catherine Howell is in a bind. She knows someone's stealing cattle; the head-counts are never right, and when she forces herself into town she can hear other ranchers talking about missing cattle too. But since Billy left, she can barely go into church on Sunday without half the town talking. When a man shows up claiming Bill sold him the ranch, she's caught between hurt pride and the need to provide for the children.

Glen Riley put every dollar he had into making the ranch work. Even with that, he'll have a hell of a time justifying buying such a small herd. But it's a start, and that's all he needs. What he finds, though, is hardly the dream opportunity that he'd hoped. A beautiful woman stranded there with three kids by the husband who sold him the deed to the property complicate matters considerably.

Catherine isn't ready to trust again, and she's certainly not ready to get into a relationship with a tumbleweed wandering gambler like Glen. Can they find a way to help each other get what they want?
