Your singular source for information, trends, and comprehensive reviews and research into developing better cosmetic products and better skin!

Cosmetic dermatologists want to understand the physiology of skin notably skin conditions they consider problematic and in need of treatment whereas product developers would like to create a cosmetic product that treats this problematic skin in order to change its appearance. They are therefore all starting with the same problem in order to get effective, though respectively different, treatments.

A Dermatological View: From Physiology to Therapy is designed to satisfy both sides of the problematic skin equation.

Chapters are organized both subjectively (physiology of normal skin, physiology of damaged skin, chemical damage and its causative point, etc.) and as a sort of journey through skin. As organized by Johann Wiechers, PhD, who also supplies the book's introduction, A Dermatological View describes the whole skin, its superficial aspects, down through the dermis, and addresses various aspects of topics ranging from enhanced skin penetration to various sensitive skin syndromes to recent advancements in products for acneic skin, contact irritation and dermatitis, moisturization, and UV protection, among others.

Written in partnership with numerous colleagues, Dr. Howard Maibach's aim is ever toward medical advancement and sustained product development in his areas of primary clinical specialty and research-based interest, including dermatopharmacology, allergic contact dermatitis, and dermatotoxicology and pathology. The information in A Dermatological View is purposed to both illuminate and to instruct.
